Lisa Watkins is another medical professional who is changing the paradigm of mental health care. As a registered nurse, Watkins made her rounds administering treatments and encouraging patients, but soon she found she was also drawn to the work being done in an outpatient health facility in Bismarck, ND. The more she observed the more she realized that so many patients had similar issues that she had herself. "I just started asking a lot of questions out of a deep-rooted interest and need to help people who were hurting emotionally, just as I was," she says.

Translating her experience at the clinic into private practice, Watkins soon was offering help to people who were deeply troubled. Watkins also began doing energy work, including Reiki training and becoming a level two Reiki healer. She was also able to begin to clear negative energies that were manifesting symptoms in her patients. Sometimes the experience of healing through our own signals of dysfunction becomes the most successful driving force for change once and for all. That is what Lisa has achieved.

"A lot of these symptoms are stress related and exacerbated due to poor diet," Watkins says. "Things like gluten, specifically, are known to cause increased inflammation in the body. The culprits of increased inflammation and stress on the body are sugar, eggs and dairy products."

Now, after ten years as a mental health nurse practitioner, Watkins has developed a holistic approach that incorporates the teachings of Dr. Kelly Brogan, Dr. Brad Nelson, and Dr. Joe Dispenza. "In my work with the body in healing, I utilize a line of supplements, called Isotonix, the world's most advanced line of nutraceuticals. Isotonix supplementation delivers nutrient dense solutions," Lisa says. "In just an hour I've had patients tell me that they feel calmer, and their thinking is clearer and more focused."
